

Playgroup

Contributed by Kay Soede
Tuesday, 12 February 2008
Last Updated Tuesday, 12 February 2008

It's raining today . . . so we've decided to stay home and not go anywhere. But since Zac has improved dramatically, he was starting to get bored and I decided to look into some facilities around.

I phoned the local government and found out that there was a playgroup for 1 year old today at the school which is right next to my aunt's apartment building. So I suddenly dressed Zac in warm coat and took off to join this group. It is completely free, and there were heaps of toys. This playgroup is in age category and 2 days of a week is for age 0, another 2 days for 1 year old, and one day for 2 year old. I suppose since there is heaps of parks etc. for older kids, they are aiming to accommodate the younger ones. It will be good for Zac & I to go regularly when we are not doing anything, so he won't miss the company of same age group J

I wasn't sure about whether I was allowed to take the photos today, so didn't take any. I will ask next time and see whether they allow me. These days, you can't even take your own child's photo at places in Australia . . . I was told not to take any photos at his swimming class at Mingara. How sad . . . I will insert some photos from the past. I arrived here on 4th February for my grandma's 88th birthday. It was a surprise for her that Zac & I flew back for it. She loved it!!! Mt. Fuji was beautiful on the way to Kobe. Couldn't see much on the way back, though. And this is the reason . . . Zac fell asleep on the way home from allergy specialist. He stayed asleep for 1 1/2hr on the pram!! I don't think I have to worry about coming home for his nap in the future . . .